[redacted] if the terrorists had succeeded in their mission and killed some Israelis, Israel would have been forced to retaliate in Lebanon. The official indicated, however, that the type of military action the Israelis have in mind is a small, retaliatory raid rather than a large-scale invasion of Lebanon. [redacted]

Comment: Despite reassurances by the Israeli Government that no decision has yet been reached to take military action in Lebanon, Israel's forces are now at the highest level of alert since the crisis last summer over the Syrian missiles in Lebanon. Israeli forces in the north, now estimated to include some 24,000 troops, could move into Lebanon with no advance notice and could be reinforced by an additional 40,000 reservists from Israel's Northern Command in 24 to 48 hours. Within 72 hours, the entire Israeli Defense Force strength of 435,000 could be mobilized, but this is not likely to occur short of an all-out war. [redacted]

The movement of the Syrian convoy could indicate that Syria is increasing its forces in Lebanon. [redacted]

Israel apparently is prepared to take action against the Palestinians in the event another terrorist incident results in the death of Israelis. A renewal of disturbances in the occupied West Bank and Gaza, or in Arab-populated villages of Israel--such as the shooting incident in old Jerusalem in which two tourists were killed and several others wounded--could divert Israel's focus from Lebanon by tying down some of its troops in security duties.
